Director's Note

One of the great challenges of sharing these thoughts with you for each production is knowing that many of our patrons will read this message after the show, when you know everything, and many more will read this while waiting for the show to start, when you know nothing. So, as a way of connecting both our "before" audience and our "after" audience into the world of Kodachrome, I invite you to take a moment to simply reflect on a topic we all have in common, whenever that may be: time.

Time in Kodachrome moves the same way it always does. We look back and remember. We think thoughts like, "It seems like just yesterday when…" or "It has been so long since…" We are aware of the present and evaluate it with statements like, "This is taking too long," or, "I need more time." We constantly look ahead to what's happening next. We think we know where we'll be or what we'll be doing and how those might be better or worse than now.

We use time to frame many of life's questions. When was the happiest time of your life? What do you want to be when you grow up? If you knew you had one day left on this earth, how would you spend it? Even a mundane, everyday question like, "What do you want to do for dinner?" implies an awareness of past, present, and future simultaneously.

If the only thing that is constant is change, then Time is Change's dependable friend and formidable enemy. Kodachrome is not here to change your perception of time, but don't be surprised if you find yourself tonight thinking more about your own past, what else is happening around and away from you in the present, and what's ahead for us all. We are all a part of the same time, and we will impact each other in ways we cannot imagine and may never know.

Whether you're looking forward to or looking back on Kodachrome, thank you for giving your time to be here tonight. Your support allows us to all be part of a moment together and to share many more in the future.

Sincerely,

Jason Hamen
Director of Theatre Programming
